

The Vigilant Committee of Philadelphia

DURING the eighteen-thirties the slavery issue in America took on a new character and life. Northern abolitionists, inspired by successful British example, organized rapidly on local and regional levels and stepped up their proselytizing and propagandizing.¹ In southern states antislavery societies died away, criticism of the "peculiar institution" was stifled, and elaborate arguments justifying its perpetuance proliferated. As sectional lines hardened, more and more black bondsmen fled from their masters to areas of freedom. When frustrated in their search, agents hired to apprehend them were not above seizing any Negro who fitted the bill of description, despite personal liberty laws passed by several states to safeguard free Negroes. In view of increasingly serious troubles of this sort, associations were formed in northern communities, largely on Negro initiative, to protect fugitives as well as free Negroes from slave catchers and kidnappers. One of the earliest of the decade, perhaps the very first, was started in New York City in 1835. It soon boasted some one hundred members and the indomitable David Ruggles as secretary.² Two years later Philadelphians followed suit at the persuasion of Robert Purvis.³

Ruggles himself stated that the New York organization was established by Negroes (National Enquirer, Jan. 14, 1837), but Roi Ottley and William J. Weatherby, eds., The Negro in New York: An Informal Study (New York, 1967), 83, have it formed by Negroes and whites.

³ Organized societies to help fugitive slaves were not unknown in the history of eastern Pennsylvania. In 1786 George Washington mentioned one of Philadelphia Quakers. Wilbur H. Siebert, The Underground Railroad from Slavery to Freedom (New York, 1899), 68. In 1837 a vigilance committee existed in Buckingham. Among its members was William H. Johnson, a leading abolitionist of Bucks County. National Enquirer, July 27, 1837; Robert C. Smedley, History of the Underground Railroad in Chester and the Neighboring Counties of Pennsylvania (Lancaster, 1883), 358.

Purvis, twenty-six years of age, was a wealthy Charleston-born mulatto who had committed himself to the antislavery cause in 1830. He had contributed to the launching of Garrison's Liberator, helped form the American Anti-Slavery Society at Philadelphia's Adelphi Hall in 1833, traveled to Great Britain and the Continent partially on an abolition mission, joined the American Moral Reform Society in 1835, and, two years later, journeyed to Harrisburg for the founding meetings of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society. That same year his razor-edge victory in rescuing a hapless victim from the clutches of slave captors convinced him that the time had come to form a group to help the runaways.

In the summer of 1836 four slave brothers, whose last name was identical to that of Dorsey, their master, took "French leave" from Liberty, Frederick County, Maryland. Reaching Philadelphia under assumed names, they found their way to Purvis' door. His reputation as a friend of fugitives was well known, and his house at Ninth and Lombard streets contained a hidden basement room, reached by a trap door, for emergency concealments.⁴ Since Thomas wished to remain in town, Purvis carried William, Charles, and Basil to the large farm he owned on the Neshaminy in Bucks County, three miles from Bristol. Hiring Basil himself, he found employment for the other two brothers with nearby farmers. But fate had an unpleasant surprise in store. The owner of the brothers learned of their whereabouts and promptly engaged a slave catcher. After Thomas had been seized in Philadelphia, Mr. Dorsey and friends then surprised Basil as he was plowing in a remote corner of the Purvis property on July 17. He put up a stout fight, but soon, handcuffed, his arms scratched, and his torn clothing hanging in strips, was bundled off in a carriage to a Bristol jail for the night. The next day, about noon, his captors hurried him into the courtroom at Doylestown, hoping to get commitment papers from Judge John Fox. To their surprise, an indignant Purvis stood there awaiting them. Having learned of the abduction, he had hastened William and

⁴ On one occasion he harbored so many fugitives that the authorities became openly suspect. Appraised of the fact, Purvis hurried all the slaves under cover of darkness aboard a friend's small steamer which plied up and down the Delaware River. An hour before scheduled it sailed away, leaving regular passengers stranded but bearing the Negroes to freedom. Unidentified newspaper clipping of August, 1890, Archibald H. Charles Dorsey to Canada, galloped to Doylestown and hired its best lawyer, Thomas Ross. The young advocate proceeded to argue so adroitly that the Judge postponed the hearing for two weeks. Purvis busied himself. He rounded up local Negroes and secretly bound them to a rescue plan in case of an unfavorable decision. He sought out the noted Philadelphia criminal lawyer David Paul Brown and, begging for his advisory services, drew $50.00 from his pocket, a fee Brown refused while, at the same time, accepting the case. Purvis wrestled with his conscience when master Dorsey offered to sell Basil for $500, for Purvis was opposed to compensated emancipation. But he finally prepared to pay the price, even when the cynical owner raised it to $800 and then $1,000. At that point, however, Basil himself put a stop to the bargaining. On August 1 when, before a crowded courtroom, Judge Fox opened the proceedings, lawyer Ross called on the claimant's lawyer, A. M. Griffith, to prove that Maryland was a slave state. Unable to produce more than a compilation of Maryland laws published by Virgil Maxey, which Ross objected was not authoritative, Griffith asked for a postponement. Out of patience with Griffith, the judge discharged Basil, saying the claimants might seek another warrant for his arrest from another magistrate. Purvis hustled Basil out of the courthouse to his buggy. As they were about to drive off, the slave party was upon them, waving the new warrant and trying to seize the horse. Purvis cracked his whip, the horse reared, and the buggy shot out of sight amid the applause of onlookers. Purvis conveyed Basil to his mother's house in Philadelphia. When the slave owner offered a $400 reward, Purvis took Basil to New York, where he left him with Joshua Leavitt, editor of the Emancipator, who sped Basil on to New England and a lifetime of peaceful existence.⁵

Viewed in the light of the increasing number of runaways, who were flocking to Philadelphia, the hazards of the Dorsey case pointed up to Purvis the need for a vigilance committee. Individual financial

The further story of Thomas is not without interest. Once he had reached Maryland he was put on board a ship at Baltimore destined for the New Orleans slave market. Philadelphians raised his purchase price of $1000 and he was freed, to become a famed Philadelphia caterer. Smedley, 356; William E. B. resources and physical efforts had to be supplemented quickly. Other abolitionists were of like mind, the affair having taught them "the importance of exertion," as William H. Johnson put it.⁶ Therefore, in August, 1837, the very month of Basil's discharge, they met to organize the Vigilant Association of Philadelphia.⁷ Its primary aim was "to create a fund to aid colored persons in distress."⁸ Members were to pay twenty-five cents on joining, contribute a minimum of seventy-five cents annually, and elect by ballot a Vigilant Committee of fifteen persons. This committee, in turn, would appoint from its number a president, a secretary, a treasurer, subcommittees, and a salaried agent to collect funds. At their first session, the members chose for president the prominent Negro dentist James McCrummell, and for secretary and treasurer, respectively, the Negroes Jacob C. White and James Needham. While the work of the committee was to be shrouded in secrecy, the existence of the Association was to be publicized.

By April, 1838, membership in the Association had grown, but help to an increasing number of fugitive slaves had created a greater need for funds. Meeting publicly in Zoar Church in Broom Street, the Association passed a resolution to publish its proceedings in the Pennsylvania Freeman, organ of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, to which some members belonged. It hoped by this sort of advertising to bring in more individuals and money.⁹ The burning of Pennsylvania Hall in May by an antiabolitionist mob emboldened rather than intimidated the foes of slavery, and by July the Association was strengthened by a valuable auxiliary in the Female Vigilant Association, founded, as the general public was informed, to "act in concert" and assist in fund raising.¹⁰ On the ladies' vigilant committee of fifteen sat President Elizabeth White, Hetty Reckless, and Elizabeth Colly. Before the close of the year, they and their associates had raised money through such means as a West Indian Emancipation Day (August 1) public meeting and a December fair.¹¹

On May 31, 1839, nine days after Edward Prigg was indicted in York County for kidnapping the fugitive Margaret Morgan of Maryland in defiance of Pennsylvania's law of 1826, the Vigilant Committee held a reorganization meeting. It elected founder Robert Purvis as president, added a vice-president in the person of Edwin H. Coates, "a real friend of colored people," retained Needham as treasurer, and accepted the Negro tailor Robert B. Ayres as secretary, thus relieving Jacob C. White of double duty so that he might devote more time to his role as agent.¹² For this exertion, plus a systematic recording of all cases handled, White was awarded an annual salary of $250. The Vigilant Committee now numbered for practical purposes the four officers, the agent, and twelve members.¹³

With an energetic and executive-minded Purvis at the head, matters were more methodically handled (even a finance committee was set up), and the Committee's business proceeded apace. Fugitives were screened to eliminate imposters, boarded in private homes of the city and countryside, clothed, given medical attention, provided with legal counsel, and spirited northward. In six months' time (from June to mid-December, 1839), the Committee, through its agent, dealt with more than fifty cases and sent to freedom forty-six fugitives, mainly from Virginia and Maryland.¹⁴ Most, going by way of New York, reached Canada, with two destined for Trinidad and one for Liverpool. Edwin H. Coates confided to Maria Weston Chapman of Boston in December, 1839: "I have within a month or thereabouts sent ten or twelve 1000 dollars worth of that kind of goods to Victorias domains, and expect to send some twenty 1000 dollars worth more in about a month from this time."¹⁵ This statement testified to the initial application of the committee members who gave freely of their time and sometimes of their money; to the firm direction of Robert Purvis; to the efficiency of agent Jacob C. White, who once put down his barbering tools for more than a fortnight that he might escort a family of eight into Canada; and to a working relationship with the New York Committee of Vigilance that rose above rapidly deepening differences between Negro New Yorkers and Negro Pennsylvanians on general antislavery policy.¹⁶

During 1840 and 1841, the expenditures and labors of the Philadelphia Vigilant Committee increased. To channel every possible penny to their essential purpose and to expedite cases, the members decided to eliminate the salary of the secretary (aggrieved, Robert B. Ayres resigned) and to substitute for the paid agent an "acting committee" of three substantial men, the organizing of whose efforts devolved upon Robert Purvis. The members also got up such schemes to tap the pocketbooks of the public as collections in Negro churches, a "soiree," and a concert. With Edwin H. Coates and other whites voted off the committee toward the close of 1840, meetings were transferred to the house of Purvis, who had sought to strengthen the body by bringing in his brother-in-law Robert B. Forten, and his fellow South Carolinian the Reverend Daniel A. Payne of the African Methodist Episcopal Church.

The tempo of action rose. From an average of two cases a week in the spring of 1841, it reached an average of three and a half cases by early fall.¹⁷ Group diligence, however, began to dwindle. Then, a few months after the satisfying ruling of the United States Supreme Court in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, came a rude shock. On August 1, 1842, the city of Philadelphia experienced one of the worst race

¹⁷ From June 23 to September 2 the Vigilant Committee handled thirty-two cases, and from September 2 to October 11, seventeen. The year 1842 brought even more impressive figures: between January 20 and June 9, forty-six cases; and between June 9 and September 8 one hundred and seventeen. riots in its pre-Civil War history.¹⁸ White hoodlums attacked Negroes parading in honor of Emancipation Day in the West Indies. When the marchers retaliated in kind, the doubly incensed assailants fell upon the Negro residential section, especially between Fifth and Eighth streets, murdering and wounding individuals and pillaging stores. The next day the mobocrats swarmed over a wider area. On both days Purvis' dwelling was one of their targets. Not only had the Vigilant Committee that met within his walls broadcast its exploits in the newspapers, but the abolitionist activities of its proud and sharp-tongued president were no secret, what with his membership in national and local antislavery societies and involvement in the underground railroad. During the first day of the riot he sat on the staircase of his house facing the front door, armed with guns and pistols and prepared to shoot the first intruder. As the howling rabble swirled about outside, two large fires in the neighborhood attracted their attention and drew them off. But the following day they were back in force. This time Purvis was saved when Father Patrick Moriarity, a Catholic priest, appeared to rebuke them. Finally, when in warmer months, they raise the question whether more slaves fled the south in the eighteen-forties than in the eighteen-fifties, when a stronger fugitive slave law went into operation—this despite the usual view of an ever-rising tide of runaways, coupled with such sensational episodes as the Shadrach and Jerry rescues of 1851, and the Burns' affair of 1854. In his documentary account of a later Philadelphia committee, William Still listed about eight hundred fugitives assisted between 1852 and 1860. On Still's listing see Larry Gara, "William Still and the Underground Railroad," Pennsylvania History, XXVIII (1961), 34. This, roughly averaged, amounted to less than two a week. Purvis himself estimated that the Vigilant Committee formed in 1837 sent north an average of one fugitive a day during its lifetime, which ended about 1852. Siebert, 10, 346. This gives the palm to the eighteen-forties and is worthy of investigation. Purvis was eighty-five years of age when he gave his approximation, and he did so without documents, for soon after the enactment of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 he had destroyed the records of escaped slaves whom he and his co-workers had helped, fearing for his family because of such potentially incriminating evidence. Granting the human tendency for innocent exaggeration, Purvis had an extraordinary memory and his mind remained alert until the last months of his life. He died Apr. 15, 1898, in his eighty-eighth year. His calculation may contain more truth than fiction. Larry Gara, "The Underground Railroad: Legend or Reality," Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, CV (1961), 337-338, deals effectively with the tendency of aging abolitionists to magnify the number of fugitive slaves they had assisted.

¹⁸ R. R. Wright Jr., The Negro in Pennsylvania (Philadelphia, 1912), 178; DuBois, 29-30.

Sheriff Lewis Morris called to say he could no longer guarantee protection, Purvis went to his country home in Bucks County to await the subsiding of the tumult.¹⁹

The affair crippled the Vigilant Committee and shook Purvis to the core.²⁰ Within a few months he acquired a sizeable property in Byberry, adjoining the Friends Meeting House grounds. Thither he removed his household, turning his back on residence in the city of Philadelphia for some thirty years. With his departure to Byberry, and his hand withdrawn, the Vigilant Committee, which could ill afford to exacerbate the public temper by concerted and advertised action, lapsed into desuetude.

On December 28, 1843, an attempt was made to revive it at a public meeting in the First Presbyterian Church, where Charles W. Gardiner was pastor. Guided by Gardiner, the Committee was to consist of faces old and new, among the latter the Negro minister Alexander Crummell, Hetty Reckless—an obvious grafting from the apparently defunct auxiliary—and J. Miller McKim, a salaried employee of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society.²¹ But Gardiner was no Purvis, nor was the pall of the 1842 riot easily dispelled.²² More likely, too, the Vigilant Committee suffered from the quarrels among Pennsylvania abolitionists that were matched by Negro feuds which crippled chances of state-wide Negro co-operation until ¹⁹ Philadelphia Press, Aug. 3, 10, 1890. His Lombard Street dwelling had been besieged before. One night, following the appearance of a newspaper article he had written against levying a special tax to pay the state debt, a mob gathered. Although he was alone, the mob withdrew under the impression that several Negro men were inside, and vented its anger by burning a Negro church in the vicinity. Philadelphia Press, Apr. 16, 1898.

²⁰ It was bad enough, he thought, that blame for the riot was thrown upon the Negroes. What plunged him into anger and despair all the more was "the apathy and inhumanity of the Whole community . . . Press, Church, Magistrates" which pitilessly disclosed the Negroes' "utter and complete nothingness in public estimation." Purvis to Henry C. Wright, Aug. 22, 1842, Garrison Papers, Boston Public Library. A portion of this letter, which appeared with slight alteration in the Liberator of Sept. 9, 1842, is given in Herbert Aptheker, ed., A Documentary History of the Negro People in the United States (New York, 1951), 220.

²¹ Ira V. Brown, "Miller McKim and Pennsylvania Abolitionism," Pennsylvania History, XXX (1963), 56-72, does not treat of this particular activity.

at least 1848.²³ Certain it is that the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, which had praised the efforts of the Committee at its annual meetings of 1841, 1843, and 1844, ceased doing so. As a body, the Vigilant Committee gave way increasingly to individual endeavors. By 1852 it had disintegrated,²⁴ but before long circumstances called forth a replacement.

Within a year of its passage in 1850, Pennsylvania had "furnished more victims to the Fugitive Slave Law than all other states of the Union."²⁵ Heart-rending episodes multiplied as Negroes were dragged back to southern slavery after having lived many years in the state, where they had married, raised children, and bought property.²⁶ The response of Philadelphia abolitionists to this situation came on December 2, 1852. At a meeting in the rooms of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, a new vigilance committee was created that owed not a little in outline to the older one. Heading the General Committee of nineteen, lending the weight of his name as the most eminent Negro in Pennsylvania, was the father of the 1837 association, Robert Purvis. His role, however, was not to be a notably busy one. Although he could count on a few veterans like Jacob C. White and John D. Oliver, far more burden fell on the four members of the Acting Committee, especially its chairman, the tireless adopted Philadelphian William Still.²⁷ The assistant since 1847 to J. Miller McKim at the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, Still was probably, as McKim was assuredly, associated with the first vigilance committee.

²³ Bell, 184, mentions the Negro feuding, an issue not explored, however, in Clarice Albert Richardson's useful "The Anti-Slavery Activity of Negroes in Pennsylvania" (unpublished M. A. essay, Howard University, 1937).

The second vigilance committee, in alliance with the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society, lasted about a decade. Dissolved at the time of the Emancipation Proclamation, it had profited with respect to method and organization from the experience of its predecessor. How much so, however, has not been readily known, for when Still published his lengthy compilation, The Underground Rail Road in 1872 he dwelt on the second committee, giving but a passing mention of the first. Still regarded the second committee as "synonymous with the underground railroad."²⁸ In 1883, taking a similar view, Robert C. Smedley's History of the Underground Railroad in Chester and the Neighboring Counties of Pennsylvania spoke of the railroad as having come into existence "about 1838."²⁹ Repeating this information with some qualification in his The Underground Railroad from Slavery to Freedom (1899), Wilbur H. Siebert added the fact that Purvis had destroyed records he had kept of the operations of the first vigilance committee. In time, the year 1838 became the accepted date for either the organization of the first Philadelphia vigilance committee or for the organization of the underground railroad.³⁰ The Vigilant Committee of Philadelphia, born in 1837, like that of its contemporary in New York was credited with having existed. Exactly how it performed remained unclear. Without documentary proof it was impossible to do more than deduce that of those vigilance committees which sprouted, after Congress passed the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850, in populous New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, as well as in smaller communities like Syracuse and Springfield, some may have been revivals or reconstitutions of earlier bodies.

In 1933, the centenary of the founding of the American Anti-Slavery Society in the City of Brotherly Love, Leon Gardiner, a cultivated Philadelphia Negro, presented a number of items to the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, including a notebook entitled "Minute Book of the Vigilant Committee of Philadelphia." Until at least 1887 it had been in the possession of Jacob C. White, Jr., whose father had served that committee in various capacities.³¹ Gardiner found it with other materials in the cellar of a church about to be demolished. This precious book, embracing affairs of some five years, is of manifold value. It shows how the earlier committee served as a model for the later and more famous one. It provides some statistics of fugitives helped—scarce information in general and especially for the period covered—statistics that confirm an early and fairly heavy flow of fugitives to Canada. It substantiates clearly the existence of a working arrangement between vigilance committees in two important cities, New York and Philadelphia; and it details the type of tasks patiently performed by men who often labored far from the limelight of dramatic incident. In revealing their names, some white and many black, the Minute Book adds to the knowledge of those “forgotten characters. . . the Negro members of the various vigilance committees,” and helps to identify as Negroes such vigilance committee and underground railroad workers as James Joshua Gould Bias, cited in Siebert’s directory.³² Lastly, it constitutes the sole extended record of a vigilance committee that existed before the Federal Fugitive Slave Law of 1850 inspired the activities of later vigilance committees—committees which are documented in such sources as William Still’s book on Philadelphia and Theodore Parker’s collection of papers, presented to the Boston Public Library, on the operations of that city’s association.

In preparing the following notebook for publication, certain changes in punctuation and capitalization have been made in the interest of easier reading, but lapses in spelling have not been corrected except in a few cases where missing letters have been sup-

³¹ A prominent man in his time, White is unknown today. He was a delegate to the first annual Negro convention held in Philadelphia in 1831; a member of the American Moral Reform Society; a founder of the Gilbert Lyceum, a Negro literary and debating society of 1841; the founder, and from 1847 on, the manager of Lebanon Cemetery; and the owner of a highly successful barbering business at 100 Old York Road. So completely has his name vanished that, except for a passing reference in such specialized publications as Henry M. Minton, Early History of Negroes in Business in Philadelphia (1913), it escapes notice even in a work so full of citations to individuals as Aptheker’s volume (see footnote 20). A picture of White appears in William Still’s book on page 400.

*Record of Cases attended to for the Vigilant
Committee of Phila by the Agent*

No. 1. June 4, 1839 Man arrested by Constable Hog[g] and committed to prison at Woodbury, N.J. without trial, or without any hearing whatever, removed from prison at Woodbury, and imprisoned at Camden, N.J. M^r Browning procured as council obtained a writ of habeas corpus from Judge Ford.

June 25th This writ was served upon the keeper of the prison as is usual or in compliance with the law in such cases; the keeper refused or could not comply with the writ, not having the man in his custody. A writ has been served upon the constable who refuses to comply with it and bring the man to a hearing. This is certainly one of the most aggravating cases on record in the U.S., perhaps the first instance of a keeper of a prison or constable has refused to obey the writ of habeas corpus; the constable above named has the keys of the prison and the man arrested by him still held a prisoner under pretence of being a fugitive from slavery. Thus are the supreme laws of the state of N.J. held at defiance by a petty constable; w[h]ether or not N.J. will suffer her laws to be trampled upon with impunity by one sworn to support them time will show. We have made arrangements for prosecuting the case.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—Before Judge King

Tuesday, August 20, 1839

Slave Case—This morning, at 10 o'clock, according to adjournment, James, the alleged slave, with his counsel, C. D. Gilpin and G. Griscom, Esqs., the claimant, Wm. Maxwell, attended by his counsel, Wm. Alleson, Esq., appeared before Judge King, who, on the testimony of Dr. James Height and Francis Cann, residents in Kent County, Maryland, decided that according to the Constitution and laws of the United States, Mr. Maxwell had clearly established his claim to the services of James. He accordingly took possession of his property, and the Court adjourned.

The witnesses testified that James was about 30 or 31 years of age; that they had known him for many years; that he ran away in 1828 from Mr. Maxwell, and that they had no doubt of his being the same person, whom from 1823 to 1827 they had been accustomed to see and know as the slave of Mr. Maxwell. As soon as the decision was given by the Judge, James was handcuffed, and in that condition will undoubtedly be conveyed to Maryland.

At a public meeting held in the colored Presbyterian Church on Thursday evening the 28th of December 1843—Charles Gardiner being in the chair & J. M. McKim secretary—the following preamble & resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Whereas it is our duty to “remember them that are in bonds as bound with them” & to aid them by all moral & peaceable means to make their escape from oppression; and whereas in the increasing spread of antislavery truths & the multiplied facilities for accomplishing their purpose the number of toil-worn fugitives from Southern injustice & slaveholding cruelty has increased to such an extent as to make it necessary for their friends in this city to adopt more liberal & systematic measures to aid them in their efforts to escape, therefore

Resolved, that it is proper to revive & reconstitute without delay the Vigilance Committee of Phil^a.

Resolved, that it be recommended of the different religious denominations of this city to form associations auxiliary to the Vigilance Committee or to adopt such measures as they may deem suitable for the purpose of raising funds to enable that committee to aid in his escape the flying bondsman.

In accordance with the first resolution, a committee of fifteen, consisting mainly of persons who had been members of the old committee were appointed as "the Vigilance Committee of Phil^a". Phil, March 11th/44

At an adjourned meeting of the Phil Vigilant Committee

Met at the house of Mr. J. J. G. Bias.

The committee appointed to investigate the charges made against the Phil Vigilant Committee in a communication, which appeared in the 'Elevator' of the 17th ultimo, made report.

The purpose of which was that the said Mrs. Bayley, was under the charge of the committee, and left Phil^a in company with Mr Douglass, that Mr. J. J. G. Bias met them at the boat and is no doubt the person alluded to as stating that he had left the money at home. The letter of which this extract was taken was addressed to Mr. Adams of the city. Mr. A refused to show the letter, but said that it was not a correct extract from the letter. Jacob B. Young, sec^y of the 'Union Vigilant Harmonious Association', was waited on but declined to give any information relative to said extract.

This report elicited pertinent remarks from several members of the Com^{ce}. Mr. J. J. G. Bias the person who went to the boat to see Mrs. Bayley off was present. Mr. B denied saying to Mrs. Bayley that he had left the money at home and promising to send it on. Mr. Bias says that he stated to Mr. Douglass that he had no funds belonging to the Com^{tee} nor had he any of his own with him, he would lay the matter before the Com^{tee} and he had no doubt they would forward the money.

Mr. Bias also made a statement showing that the money in his hands were properly appropriated prior to Mrs. Bayley leaving Phil^a.

He received from anti slavery meeting $2, from Rev^d. Cha^s. W. Gardiner $9, making $11; expended for three cases $10.75.

Mr Bias' statement being satisfactory to the committee, the following Resolution was unanimously adopted—

Whereas a communication published in the 'Elevator' 17th Feb. said to be an "extract from a letter from Mrs. Harriet Bayley" charging the person who was at the wharf the morning she started with having made false representations to her with regard to pecuniary aid, and whereas Mr. J. J. G. Bias was the person who went to the boat to see Mrs. Bayley off, and whereas we have full & satisfactory evidence that Mr. Bias had no money of the Com^{tee} to apply to such purpose and therefore could not have made any such representation & pretenses, Therefore resolved that We the Phil^a Vigilant Com^{tee} deem it our duty to relieve Mr. Bias from the unfavorable impression which this imputation is calculated to excite in the public mind, as far as is in our power.

Resolved that we tender Mr. Bias our sympathies under the suffering which this charge may have occasioned.

The Secretary was instructed to address a letter to Mr. Douglass on this subject.

Members present: C. W. Gardiner, Alex Crummell, James McCrummell, W^m. A. Burleigh, J. J. G. Bias, Peter Lester, J. C. White, Mr. Torry. Peter Brook was present.
