COVER ILLUSTRATION: “Bill Keating, the Singing Miner.” Photograph from the George Korson Collection, American Folklife Center, Library of Congress. For a discussion of Keating, Pennsylvania miner and minstrel, and what his story can teach us about work, folk culture, and the ways that museums can forget as well as remember, see Eric Nystrom’s article in this issue.

Contributors

DANIEL P. BARR is assistant professor of history at Robert Morris University in suburban Pittsburgh, where he teaches courses in early American history, Native American history, and the history of Pennsylvania. He is the editor of The Boundaries Between Us: Natives and Newcomers along the Frontiers of the Old Northwest Territory, 1740–1840 (2006) and author of Unconquered: The Iroquois League at War in Colonial America (2006). He is currently completing a book on the early settlement of Pittsburgh and the western Pennsylvania frontier.

BILL LYNSKEY, a former journalist and editor in the publishing world, is currently a member of the public programs department at the National Constitution Center, a Philadelphia-based, nonpartisan museum dedicated to increasing public understanding of and appreciation for the U.S. Constitution, its history and contemporary relevance.

ERIC C. NYSTROM is a PhD candidate in the history of technology at Johns Hopkins University. His dissertation focuses on the creation and use of visual representations, including maps, models, photographs, blueprints, and exhibits, by American mining engineers in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.
