Contributors

GEORGE W. BOUDREAU is associate professor of history and humanities at Penn State Capital College, where he teaches courses on early America and public history. He is currently director of "A Rising People: Benjamin Franklin and the Americans," an NEH Landmarks Workshop for K-12 teachers in Philadelphia and is completing books on Independence National Historical Park and on the ways early Philadelphians experienced the Enlightenment.

JANE E. CALVERT earned her PhD from the University of Chicago. She was assistant professor of history at St. Mary's College of Maryland and will be at the University of Kentucky in fall 2007. Her monograph, Quaker Constitutionalism and the Origins of American Civil Disobedience, is under contract with Cambridge University Press. She is also currently working on a collection of John Dickinson's political writings and speeches, as well as his biography.

ELIZABETH P. MCLEAN is a graduate of the Arboretum School of the Barnes Foundation and has a master's degree in American history from the University of Pennsylvania. She is a research associate in botany at the Academy of Natural Sciences.

MARK REINBERGER is an associate professor at the University of Georgia, where he teaches courses in the history of architecture and historic preservation. He holds degrees from the University of Virginia and Cornell University and is the author of Utility and Beauty: Robert Wellford and Composition Ornament in America (2003).
