The Union League of Philadelphia and the Civil War

By Barbara J. Mitnick
DECEMBER 27, 1862, began as an ordinary Saturday in a city located at the crossroads of a war-torn nation. Philadelphians on both sides of the secession and slavery issues were living side by side, walking the same streets, dining in the same clubs, and conducting business in the city’s financial institutions and commercial establishments. Just six weeks earlier, searching for a place “where true men might breathe without having their atmosphere contaminated by treason,” a small group of pro-Union men had established The Union Club of Philadelphia, with articles of association stipulating “unqualified loyalty to the Government of the United States and unwavering support of its measures for the suppression of the Rebellion.” By late December, after recognizing a need to encourage even stronger support, they went on to found The Union League of Philadelphia, the first association of its kind in the nation, with the more resolute purpose of using “every proper means in public and private” to aid the Union cause.

The mission would become a grand success. The Union League of Philadelphia’s proud contributions of determination, intellect, and treasure provided crucial aid to President Abraham Lincoln and the Northern forces. The nation that had declared its independence in the League’s home city 89 years earlier was saved.
Before the war, a significant number of Philadelphians had strong Southern family, business, and educational affiliations. The city, as described by writer, historian, and Republican politician Alexander McClure, was “a great emporium of Southern commerce”—an important source for goods highly prized by Southern customers. Conversely, the city’s manufacturers relied on the importation of raw materials from Southern vendors—in particular, lumber, turpentine, and cotton. Nevertheless, at the time of President Abraham Lincoln’s election in the fall of 1860, Philadelphia, and, indeed, the whole of Pennsylvania, remained bitterly divided over issues related to slavery and civil rights. When meetings in late 1860 and early January 1861 failed to resolve the national crisis, many Southern sympathizers continued to argue for a settlement that would avoid war while permitting the continuation of slavery. Pennsylvania Supreme Court associate justice George W. Woodward even went so far as to state his belief in the “incalculable blessing” of slavery and his hope that if there was to be a division of the Union, the line of separation should “run north of Pennsylvania!”

The audacious attack on Fort Sumter by Confederate forces on April 12, 1861, quickly raised the level of Union support among Philadelphians, as well as escalated acts of rebellion in the city by Southern sympathizers. While Philadelphia’s pro-Union newspapers kept the public informed, local Copperhead publications such as the Palmetto Flag (named for the state flag and symbol of South Carolina), which had debuted in early April, continued to espouse Southern positions. On April 15, only three days after the fall of Sumter, angry mobs filled the streets of Philadelphia; some began to attack the Palmetto Flag’s offices. Indeed, local diarist Sidney George Fisher recorded that “several well-known persons, who had openly expressed secession opinions, had been assaulted in the streets.” On the same day, President Lincoln issued a proclamation calling for 75,000 troops, to which loyal Philadelphians, including later founders of the Union League, replied by declaring their “unalterable determination to sustain the Government in its efforts to maintain the honor, the integrity, and the existence of our national Union.”

Within this context of war, destruction, and local tension, prominent Philadelphians began a process that would fundamentally change the course of local history and that of the nation. For it was in November 1862 that lawyer, poet, playwright, patriot, and (later) diplomat George Henry Boker and Pennsylvania’s eminent jurist Judge John Innes Clark Hare met by chance “in” Seventh Street and began a conversation that would result in the founding of The Union League of Philadelphia.
Photograph of Abraham Lincoln taken by Mathew Brady, February 27, 1860. Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division, LC-DIG-ppmsca-39102.
On that fateful day, Boker and Hare began their conversation with what Boker would later describe as “a comparison of their sorrows.”
playwriting. By 1860, he had become an ardent opponent of slavery and a supporter of the policies of Abraham Lincoln; he would soon defend the president’s suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Boker had also begun to use his considerable literary talents to circulate his political philosophy. In “Ad Poetas,” published in the city’s Daily Evening Bulletin in September 1861, he produced a lyrical counterpart to Lincoln’s call to arms as he encouraged “the heroes of our holy cause” to reunite the union of American states. Judge Hare particularly expressed his displeasure with “men, who were almost leagued with the Southern traitors … walking with high heads among our people, openly exulting in our discomfiture, and eagerly waiting for the day of our utter overthrow.” He ruminated about withdrawing from “social relations” with disloyal men and organizing a society of loyalists into a “Union Club” that would “positively” exclude those deemed disloyal “from the meetings of the proposed club by the strongest enactments of the articles of association.” “Warmed with the zeal of fresh conviction,” Boker immediately took the proposal to the nearby office of Morton McMichael, publisher of the North American, where he was sure he would find a receptive audience. Widely known for his oratorical and publishing skills, McMichael would later gain fame for his government and civic service, which came to include a term as mayor of Philadelphia from 1866 to 1869 and the presidency of the Union League from 1870 to 1874.

Invitations, although deliberately unsigned due to the current danger, were sent to a select group of men by attorney Benjamin Gerhard to attend a gathering at his Fourth Street home (reportedly on November 15), which he covertly described as “a meeting of loyal men, for a patriotic purpose.” Although serious issues were on the agenda, little was accomplished until the second meeting, when a standing committee consisting of McMichael, Hare, Boker, Gerhard, and Charles Gibbons submitted four articles of association naming
The new organization “The Union Club of Philadelphia” and limiting its membership to 50 men who would declare “unqualified loyalty to the Government of the United States and unwavering support of its measures for the suppression of the Rebellion.” During the new organization’s next five meetings, members exhibited increasing enthusiasm for the “cause” as well as “hatred and alarm” directed at disloyal men. At the same time, McMichael also kept up the momentum in his North American editorials by praising Lincoln’s preliminary announcement of the Emancipation Proclamation, condemning slavery, and railing against secession.11

Word of the Union Club’s mission quickly spread, as evidenced by the increasing number of attendees at its meetings. Organizers resolved to expand the club’s membership to further popularize their principles, and, as Boker later recalled, the group moved toward including “in one great association all the patriotic citizens of Philadelphia who might choose to participate in our movement.”12

Finally, on December 27, at the home of Philadelphia physician J. Forsyth Meigs, The Union League of Philadelphia was born (its new designation, “League,” likely related to its common definition as a compact or agreement for promoting mutual protection and common interests). The goal was to organize loyalists of every political persuasion who shared one all-important objective: the salvation of the American Union. Its articles of association, more aggressive than those of the Union Club, called for members to use “every proper means in public and private” for that purpose.13 Political arguments related to other national issues of the day, such as the tariff, popular sovereignty, and the Homestead Act, would be put off to a later time. It is not surprising, therefore, that the initial list of the more than 250 men who signed on to the League’s purpose between December 27, 1862, and January 10, 1863, would include members of both major political parties as well as those of undetermined affiliation. The Union League did not originate as a Republican club, but as one that would begin and continue to serve the dedicated pro-Union positions of members of all parties.14

In early January 1863, as the Union League was digesting the news of Lincoln’s final issue of the Emancipation Proclamation, it began to organize its administrative structure. Unlike the Union Club, which had met in the Emancipation Proclamation, 1863, signed by President Lincoln and Secretary of State Seward. This copy is one of 48 autographed printings by Frederick Leypoldt in Philadelphia for Charles Godfrey Leland and George H. Boker for sale as fundraisers at the Great Central Sanitary Fair held in Philadelphia in June 1864. Historical Society of Pennsylvania Treasures Collection.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.

Whereas, on the twenty-second day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, a proclamation was issued by the President of the United States, containing, among other things, the following, to wit:

"That on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforth, and forever, free; and the Executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom.

"That the Executive will, on the first day of January aforesaid, by proclamation, designate the States and parts of States, if any, in which the people thereof, respectively, shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof, shall on that day be in good faith represented in Congress of the United States, by members chosen thereunto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such State shall have participated, shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State, and the people thereof, are not then in rebellion against the United States."

Now, therefore, I, ABRAHAM LINCOLN, President of the United States, by virtue of the power in me vested as commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, in time of actual armed rebellion against the authority and government of the United States, and as a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing said rebellion, do, on this first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and in accordance with my purpose so to do, publicly proclaimed for the full period of one hundred days from the day first above mentioned, order and designate as the States and parts of States wherein the people thereof, respectively, are this day in rebellion against the United States, the following: Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, (except the Parishes of St. Bernard, Plaquemines, Jefferson, St. John, St. Charles, St. James, Ascension, Assumption, Terre Bonne, Lafourche, St. Mary, St. Martin, and Orleans, including the City of New Orleans,) Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Virginia, (except the forty-eight counties designated as West Virginia,) and also the counties of Berkeley, Acomac, Northampton, Elizabeth City, York, Princess Anne, and Norfolk, including the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth,) and which excepted parts are for the present left precisely as if this proclamation were not issued.

And by virtue of the power and for the purpose aforesaid, I do order and declare that all persons held as slaves within said designated States and parts of States are and henceforward shall be free; and that the Executive government of the United States, including the military and naval authorities thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of said persons.

And I hereby enjoin upon the people so declared to be free to abstain from all violence, unless in necessary self-defense; and I recommend to them that, in all cases when allowed, they labor faithfully for reasonable wages.

And I further declare and make known that such persons, if resettled in the army service of the United States, to garrison forts, positions, stations, and other places, and to man vessels of all sorts in said service.

And upon this act, sincerely believed to be an act of justice warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity, I invoke the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington this first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the eighty-seventh.

[Seal]

By the President:

Abraham Lincoln

Secretary of State.
Cover of the Planter’s Almanac, published by The Union League of Philadelphia, 1864.
Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

“The New Union League House,”
The Union League of Philadelphia.
In an attempt to gain access behind enemy lines, the Union League ingeniously sponsored the publication of a pamphlet disguised as the Planter’s Almanac for 1864, which actually included information encouraging Southern soldiers to desert.
similar enterprises, but none approached the output and scope of the Philadelphia Union League, nor its ultimate impact.

In Boker's first annual report, he noted the creation of a magnificent Union League gold medal that was presented to President Lincoln on August 26. Silver counterparts were additionally awarded to members of the president's cabinet and to outstanding military and naval commanders. The beginning of another significant practice was initiated when the League began to acquire paintings and sculpture as well as manuscripts, books, and important relics of the war. These traditions have continued to the present day.

By June 1863, along with all Philadelphians, League members feared a possible invasion of Pennsylvania by General Robert E. Lee and the Confederate army. Additional troops were needed; the city council voted a sum of $500,000 to raise enlistments, provide equipment, and pay three-month city volunteers. At the same time, Mayor Alexander Henry ordered business closures and urged all residents to join the defense effort. The Home Guard was activated, and citizens and clergy alike began to dig protective entrenchments. The leadership of the Union League assembled an emergency fund of $80,000, a sum that originally included money for "a grand national celebration" for the League's first Fourth of July, which it appropriately curtailed. Boker also reported on a new Supervisory Committee for the Enlistment of Colored Troops begun by League members, a committee that had the moral support of the organization.

The League also organized a Board of Enlistments, advertising bounties of from $35 to $300, the highest in the city. In little time, it raised more than $100,000 to provide funding for 10,000 men and would ultimately support nine regiments and one of cavalry. Fortunately, by July 4, it was clear that additional men and entrenchments for the city would not be necessary, for after a three-day battle, Pennsylvanian George G. Meade and the Union army had repelled Lee's Army of Northern Virginia at Gettysburg. In November 1863, President Lincoln dedicated a national cemetery at the Gettysburg battlefield in what has come to be remembered as one of the finest speeches in history—one that by 1917 would be inscribed in its entirety on the walls of the Union League's Lincoln Memorial Room.

Lincoln praised the Union League in an impromptu speech as “an organization free from political prejudices and prompted in its formation by motives of the highest patriotism.”

Despite the growing public discontent with the length and casualties of the war, in January 1864 the Union League unanimously passed a resolution of support for the president, which McMichael published in the North American, and championed Lincoln's reelection in its newspaper, the Union League Gazette, which had a print run of some 560,000 copies. In June, Lincoln made his only visit to the Union League when he and Mary Todd Lincoln visited the city's Great Central Morton McMichael, publisher of the North American, ca. 1876.
Historical Society of Pennsylvania Portrait Collection.
Sanitary Fair. At a grand reception, Lincoln praised the Union League in an impromptu speech as “an organization free from political prejudices and prompted in its formation by motives of the highest patriotism.”

By early 1864, the Union League had begun to receive some well-earned accolades for its support during the war. In February, a notable example came from the pen of Lincoln’s second secretary of war, Edwin Stanton, in a letter to Secretary Boker acknowledging his receipt of a League Silver Medal. Stanton praised the “labors” and the “unflinching courage of the Union League of Philadelphia” that “contributed no small share” to what was beginning to be seen as an ultimate Northern victory. Years later, Pennsylvanian Simon Cameron, Lincoln’s first secretary of war, stated his belief that “this Union League, under God, did more than any civil organization in America to put down the Rebellion.”

The war ended on April 9, 1865, just over three years and three months after The Union League of Philadelphia’s founding. On April 22, a week after the tragic assassination of Lincoln, Union League members met and followed his funeral cortège along with some 30,000 Philadelphians. By July, George Boker wrote one of his most significant poems, “Our Heroic Themes,” to eulogize the humble character of the martyred president. At the end of the year, in the League annual report, Boker wrote of the end of the war, declaring “the Rebellion is no more. It died hard, it died justly, it died, as all good men desired that it should, by the edge of the sword.” He left his readers with hope for a lasting peace, stating that it “was secured by no terms or compromises with the traitors; by not yielding of a single principle of policy or of conscience involved in the contest; by no injudicious permission to the conquered to revive the old abuses of their social system; and thus, in the midst of a mis-called peace, to plant in the land the seeds of another gigantic war.”

Since the successful completion of this first mission, the sense of civic responsibility inherent in the Union League survives in the continuing patriotism of its members as well as its devotion to pursuing election reform, humanitarian efforts on behalf of city residents and immigrants, financial and manpower aid and assistance for all of the nation’s wars, and educational support for young people and adults. In recent years, these goals have been accomplished primarily through the establishment and outreach of the League’s Abraham Lincoln Foundation, along with other significant League initiatives, most recently The Sir John Templeton Heritage Center. For all of these efforts and more, The Union League of Philadelphia was honored during its sesquicentennial in 2012 as the #1 City Club in the nation.

Barbara J. Mitnick is chief contributor and general editor to The Union League of Philadelphia: The First 150 Years (2012).
Boker wrote of the end of the war, declaring “the Rebellion is no more. It died hard, it died justly, it died, as all good men desired that it should, by the edge of the sword.”

2 For the Articles of Association of The Union League of Philadelphia, see Mitnick, The Union League, 33–35 and fig. 2.21.

6 April 15, 1861, entry, “The Diary of Sidney George Fisher, 1861,” Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography 88 (1964): 80. For the response to President Lincoln’s proclamation, see Philadelphia Inquirer, April 15, 1861.

11 Boker, Memorial, 20–21. See also McMichael’s North American editorials published on September 19, October 4, November 6, and November 18, 1862.

12 Boker, Memorial, 23.

13 See Mitnick, The Union League, 33.

17 See Mitnick, “The Union League and the War to Preserve the Union,” in The Union League, 49–75.

19 The Planter’s Almanac for 1864 (Philadelphia: Ling and Baird, 1864). The pamphlet also included Lincoln’s Amnesty Proclamation, stating conditions for receiving rebel deserters.

21 For a discussion of the number and significance of the Union League pamphlets, see Mitnick, The Union League, 61–67.

22 Boker, Annual Report (1863), 12.

27 For the Cameron and Stanton correspondence, see the Archives of The Union League of Philadelphia.

28 Boker delivered “Our Heroic Themes” to the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard University on July 20, 1865. See also Boker, Our Heroic Themes: A Poem (Boston: Ticknor and Fields, 1865).

30 This designation was awarded by the Platinum Clubs of America.